tested for multiple washes," says a spokesperson for Arvind Lifeskyle Brand, the company behind the Arrow Smart Shirt. Laumched in August 2016, the smart shirt has garnered positive reviews so far. The product is available for sale both online and offine. Another recent innovation comes from the combined efforts of Project Jacquard by Googleand clothing company Levi's. Then result is the Levi's Commuter Trucker Jacket, which weaves interactive fibres into denim to create a fashionable yet functional jacket. According to the Project Jacquard website, the jacket is designed specifically for urban bike commuters and allows cyclists to control their mobile experience and connect to a variety of services, such as music or maps, directly from the jacket sleeve. The edited no mercial commercial control the project specument of the project sp directly from the jacket sleeve. The digital connectivi-ty is possible through a smart tag. Apart from the tag, the whole interactive garment is washable and durable just like regular denim.

The future of smart cloth ing only gets better. Imagine this situation: You are running late for a meeting and your smartphone decides to run out of juice. The obvious solution that comes to your mind is a portable power-bank. But what if you were wearing your powerbank? As per a study published in the scientific journal ACS Nano, Chinese researchers have created new smart fibers that

The scientists created two different types of fibres or threads. "The fibre supercapacitor with merits of tailorability, untradist charging capability, and ultrahigh bending-resistance is used as the energy storage module, while an all-solid dys-ensisties dolar cell textile is used as the solar energy harvesting module, "the study says. Once combined, the two materians formed a flexible textile that can be cut and tailored into a 'smart garment' that can be fully charged by smilght. This could possibly charge smartphones and tablests. While this clothing is not yet available in the market, it presents a fascinating future where wearables could well and truly become a part of our body. We could soon power wearable devices using justout body heat, thanks to a new flexible supercapacitor that can charge itself using heat from the surroundings.—without any external power supply or battery.

meat from the surroundings
—without any external power supply or battery.
Reports also say researchers have developed a new concept of electrical energy storage—thermally chargeable solid-state supercapacitize; which allows capacitors, which allows charging to be completed us-ing heat energy in addition to the traditional electrical charging method for capacitors. "This is the first time that it has been discovered that a solid-statepolymerelectrolyte can produce large thermally induced voltage," Choongho Yu, professor at Texas A&M University in the US, was quoted saying in a news report

"The voltage can then be used to initiate an electrochemical reaction in electrodes for charging." Vaudaded.

The supercapacitor works by converting thermal energy into electrical energy and then storing it in the device at the same time. Human body heat, or any heat dissipating objects that create temperature differences from their surroundings, can be used to charge the capacitor without any external power source.

Code related to Russia hacking found on US computer

Dec 31: A code associated with a broad Russian hacking campaign dubbed Crizzly Steppe by the Obama administration has been detected on a laptop associated with a Vermont electric utility but not connected to the grid, the utility said on Friday.

"We took immediate action to isolate the laptop and alerted federal officials of this finding," the Burlington Electric Department said in a statement." Our tream is working with federal officials to trace this malware and prevent any other attempts to infiltrate utility systems."

The department of homelands court and the proposed proposed properties on Thursday night about a malware code used in Grizzly Steppe, the Burlington Electric Department said.

"We acted quickly to scan all computers in our system for the malware road grant of the malware signature. We detected the malware in our system for the malware road grant under the malware signature. We detected the malware road protonnected to our organisation's grid systems," it said.

The matched malware code on the laptop may have result-ed from a relatively benign episode, such as visiting a questionable website, asource familiar with the matter said, suggesting Russian hackers may not have been directly involved. It was not clear when the incident occurred.

On Thursday, President Barack Obama ordered the expulsion of 35 Russian suspected spies and imposed sanctions on two Russian intelligence agencies over their involvement in hacking US political groups in the 2016 presidential election.

The statement came after a Washington Post report that Russian hackers pene-trated a Vermont utility.
